For Men Who Think of Sirens as Driving Music:

Addressing the emotional needs of first responders and public safety officials

First responders and public safety workers experience repeated exposure to trauma through their work. This can have a lasting impact on mental well-being, putting these men at increased risk for conditions such as posttraumatic stress disorder (PTSD), depression, anxiety, and substance use disorders. For example, the National Firefighters Foundation reports that in any year, a department is four times more likely to experience the suicide death of a member than a line-of-duty death.

As a result of career-related stress, first responders and public safety workers often face emotional needs unique to their occupations and consequently require access to resources that are specific to those circumstances.

Please join us on Tuesday, April 11th, at 12 noon EDT for the free webinar *For Men Who Think of Sirens as Driving Music: Addressing the Emotional Needs of First Responders and Public Safety Officials.

You will learn what experts are doing to prevent suicide and improve the mental health of police, firefighters, emergency medical personnel, and corrections officers. Register here to attend.
